LENOX AVENUE RIDERS IMPOLITE DIVEKEEPER

Men in Crowded Subway Cars Give No Heed to Tired Woman and Allow Her to Stand, Despite the $10 Prize Offered.

BY CATHERINE KING. riders who have the proud record of winning the $10 order each of the two times I tried that route before, failed to come up to their mark last night when I made three round trips between Brooklyn Bridge station and Fourteenth street. And not a seat offered me when Conditions on the Lenox avenue line would seem to breed bad manners from the fact that the trains seem insufficient to cope with the loads at Brooklyn Bridge even, to say nothing of the unfortunate Harlemites who get on further up at Fourteenth street and the Grand Central, But although I didn't get a sent, I noted that most of the standers last night were men, while the women had one-third of the seats. The first car I tried was No. 3558, with Guard No. 0177. I crowded in the rear door and stood before the familiar line of men occupying all the side seats on the west side of the car. Four other women I could see standing in the rear half of the car, and from there forward there was such a solid mass of men standing I could not count.

No Politeness There.

I alighted at Fourteenth street and, crossing to the downtown side, waited for a Lenox avenue express. It came, with several filled cars. I tried car No. 8605, which was occupied mainly by laborers. The east-side seats of the rear half held men only, while two women had squeezed into the west side seats. I stood before a dirty-faced-and-handed slim man in dark clothes and black shirt and a fat man, with blond-gray mustache, black derby hat and tan topcoat. Black Derby read his paper and Dirty Hands manicured his nails with an alarming big jackknife as an excuse for not looking up at me. I couldn't help thinking that for getting up to stand the few minutes it takes to the bridge might have netted him enough to have a peroxide blonde manicurist fix those nails and leave $9.50 for extras. Crossing to the uptown side of the Brooklyn Bridge station I boarded the next Lenox train, car No. 8631, which was not so full as the car on which I made my earlier trip up.

I dangled on a strap in front of a fat man with a black alderman's mustache. He wore a black derby and tan topcoat among other things, and sat last of a row of five men. Next to him sat a large young woman in black, saw Miss King halfway down the car with a string of pink beads. A girl and motioned her to come and take with a bright red lamp-shade stood my seat. I had no thought of a money that if any respectable aged wombetween the cross seats nearest me. A with a bright red lamp-shade stood between the cross seats nearest me. A colored man stood between us. Further up in the car stood other men and women—such a dense mass I could not count them. No score.

The Lenox train back was uncrowded, and I rode in comfort.

On the uptown platform, while waiting for the next train, a bright-eyed boy, wearing a flat slouch hat, recognized me and whispered this discovery to a man standing near, who happened to be an Evening World reporter. If to be an Evening World reporter. If that youth had got a seat in my car I might have had a different story. But when the next crowded Lenox

'The Ev ming World has done a good thing in calling attention to this brutal lack of consideration for women,' he continued. 'I do not know that any reform can be scoured, for it ress not with the railroad companies, as some seem to think, but with men themselves to change it. The treatment of women in public vehicles is awful Both boys and men nowadays seem to have fear of and respect for nothing but the strong hand—that is, persons stronger and more brutal than themselves."

The Women Won't Thank You. But when the next crowded Lenox train came in I forced my way into the jam in car No. 3418—and stood encased in swaying, unhappy, uncomfortable humanity to Fourteenth street, where I managed to fight my way out. The men thad all the majority there, both in sitting and standing. Seats both in sitting and standing. Seats to we were frequently given up my were easy to find going back down, and To the Editor of The Evening World: cents per day on car fares, let me say seat to wemen who would not condescend to even nod their thanks, but took the seat as a matter of course. These things men notice, and it has a tendency to blunt a man's better sentiments of politeners. On one occasion, while riding on Third avenue from Fourteenth street to Elghty-first street. I gave my seat to four different ladies, and only one (an old Hebrew lady with an old shawl over her head), had the common politeness to thank me.

WITH A "PULL" IS CONVICTED

Brooklyn Man Arrested Eighteen Times, Defied Court Mysteriously.

After eighteen futile attempts during many years the police of Brooklyn have succeeded in convicting Harry Datalinski of keeping a disorderly house. He was found guilty to-day in the County Court, before Judge Crane, and the owner of his place, the Bagamore Hotel, at No. 63 Flatbush avenue, has been notified that the property must be no longer used for disorderly purposes.

Policemen, ministers and the press of Brooklyn have fouught Detalinski for years. The Sagamore Hotel was raided time and time again, but through some mysterious influence the man was always acquitted. When Inspector Cross was sent to Brooklyn he noticed that Dzialinski appeared to be immune in General Sessions, and studied the situation.

Chose detailed men from his personal staff to get evidence against Dzialinski, instructing them how to go about it so that the evidence would train in a court of law. When the evidence was secured, instead of arresting Dzialinski and taking him into the Court of
